Lack of active p38 in skeletal muscle following hindlimb ischemia. This study examines the hypothesis that lack of p38 phosphorylation in skeletal muscle may contribute to the inability of muscle to re-perfuse after a period of ischemia. The time of ischemia of five hours produced about 70% decrease in active p38. At this ischemic period the rats were killed to examine the ability of muscle to re-perfuse. In the rats in which active p38 was not decreased by ischemia, the number of capillaries in muscle was decreased by only 13%, significantly less than in animals with p38 in muscle. However, when rats in which p38 had been decreased by ischemia were examined at a recovery period of 3 and 8 weeks, muscle function in animals with low p38 was significantly worse than in those with normal p38. The results suggested that the effects of ischemia on p38 in skeletal muscle result in the inability to recover muscle function.

A case of adrenocortical carcinoma presenting as a systemic inflammatory process. Adrenocortical carcinoma represents a rare malignancy in the face of an increasing incidence worldwide. The majority of adrenocortical carcinomas are hormonally active with nearly a 100% incidence of late metastatic disease. In the absence of a specific marker, this malignancy is very difficult to diagnose because of its wide differential diagnosis, which includes both benign and malignant processes including tuberculosis, lymphoma, and collagen vascular disease. The authors present an atypical case of adrenocortical carcinoma with concomitant pulmonary tuberculosis presenting with a systemic inflammatory process in a 61-year-old man and discuss the pathophysiology and diagnostic approach of this disease.

Can you break the law without breaking the law? It's a question that has fascinated legal thinkers for thousands of years, and it's been hotly debated, right down to the moment in time when Captain James Cook's ship, HMS Endeavour, made it safely back to England, after a time of exploration and diplomacy, without being captured by the Spanish. The question is, can you get away with breaking the law if you can persuade the people on the other end that the law you're breaking was never created in the first place? It's all about semantics, and more importantly, it's about how willing a nation is to break the law
